Dave Pollard extends the GTD method to add in couple of new ways on tracking different data. He has couple of new sections called Calendar, Tickler, Obstacles, Inspirations to track different type of tasks. Now Dave tracks tasks with dates and also coloured coding to specify the type of the projects. The coloured coding seems like a good idea as well. He then followed his five steps process. I see step three is probably the most important part: ... 3. As new situations come up, I process them using the standard GTD process shown in the flowchart at the top of this article (it's become second nature to me, so I rarely have to look at this flowchart any more), and I slot the Next Actions and Appointments into either Section A or B as appropriate. If the Next Action is neither urgent (italized) nor important (boldfaced), I seriously consider whether it should be done at all. A key part of Getting Things Done is Learning to Say No. Sometimes, though, an interesting project (like "submit PKM article to journal" in the list above) is neither urgent nor important, but could lead to things that are, so these stay in Section B, my "tickler file", until something occurs to make them urgent or important, or the opportunity passes and they get deleted. I review Section B every day. ... Very detailed process yet effective. Go and read on the article for all diagrams and examples on this implementation. Getting Things Done: The Procrastinator's Version - [How to Save the World] Share Pin it Tweet Share Email The latest version of Windows 10 is the November 2021 Update, version "21H2," which was released on November 16, 2021. Microsoft will now release new major updates every year. These major updates can take some time to reach your PC since Microsoft and PC manufacturers do extensive testing before fully rolling them out. Let's take a look at what's included in the latest version, how to find out what version you're running, and how you can skip the wait and get the most recent version if you don't already have it. The Latest Version Is the November 2021 Update The latest version of Windows 10 is the November 2021 Update, which was released on November 16, 2021. This update was codenamed "21H2" during its development process, as it was released in the second half of 2021. Its final build number is 19044. Windows 10's November 2021 Update is a small update that focuses on bug fixes, just like the May 2021 Update and October 2020 Update were before it. It does have a few other small changes, including compatibility with the "SAB Hash to Element" security standard used by some wireless WPA3 networks and GPU compute support for the Windows Subsystem for Linux. How to Check if You Have the Latest Version To see which version of Windows 10 you have, open your Start menu, and then click the gear-shaped "Settings" icon to open the Settings app. You can also fire up the app by pressing Windows+I. RELATED: How to Find Out Which Build and Version of Windows 10 You Have Head to System > About in the Settings window, and then scroll down toward the bottom to the "Windows Specifications" section. A version number of "21H2" indicates you're using the November 2021 Update. This is the latest version. If you see a lower version number, you're using an older version. Note: 21H2 is a smaller update, so the "Installed On" date may not be updated here and may show a date in 2020 instead of 2021. Rest assured that, if the Settings app says you're using version 21H2, you have the latest version. In the screenshot, the PC is running Windows 10 version 20H2. If you see a higher version number than 21H2 on your system, you're likely running an unstable Insider Preview version of Windows. How to Update to the Latest Version When Microsoft provides the update to your PC, it automatically installs itself. But Microsoft doesn't offer new Windows updates to all PCs at once. Instead, Microsoft rolls them out slowly over time, after both Microsoft and the various PC manufacturers check to see if they cause problems with different hardware configurations. If your PC doesn't get the update, Microsoft isn't entirely confident it will work on your hardware just yet. However, you can override this and choose to install the update anyway. After all, you can always downgrade back to your current version of Windows 10 if you have any problems, assuming you choose to do so within ten days after upgrading. There's some risk here, but you are still installing a stable operating system update. To install the update anyway, you can now head to Settings > Update & Security > Windows Update and click the "Check for Updates" button. If a stable version of Windows 10 is available, Windows Update may offer to download and install it—even if it hasn't been rolled out to your PC yet. Look for a "Download and install now" link below a notice about a "Feature Update" being available for your PC. Microsoft You can also visit Microsoft's Download Windows 10 page to update. Click the "Update now" button to download the Update Assistant tool, and then run the tool. It will upgrade your PC to the latest version of Windows 10—even if the update wasn't offered to you via Windows Update. The tool may still refuse to install the update if some issues need to be fixed with your PC's configuration first. You can either wait or try to troubleshoot the problem yourself. Atop the Food Chain That the richest Americans have extended their advantage on the other 99% is well known. This spring, the Congressional Budget Office reported that, during the 35-year period from 1979 through 2014, the top 1% of wage earners had increased their real incomes by a cumulative 221%, as opposed to 69% improvement for the next wealthiest 19%, and 27% for the four remaining quintiles. If this were a fight, it would be stopped. Less recognized is that the stock market has followed suit, with the largest 1% of companies outgaining their rivals. To be sure, this has not been a 35-year trend. The behemoths are ahead only since the 2008 financial crisis, with most of their bulge occurring over the past five years. Nonetheless, it has been a noteworthy achievement; the bluest of chips do not typically lead a bull market. Morningstar's U.S. stock database contained 6,706 companies in August 2013. The largest, at $443 billion of stock-market capitalization, was Apple (AAPL). The smallest was a firm called Digital Asset Monetary Network, which was valued at $10 million. I split the database into two parts, a) the biggest 67 companies (top 1%); and b) the remaining 6,639 firms (bottom 99%). Then I examined how their stocks have since performed over the ensuing five years. The median return for the largest 1% of companies was 9.2% annualized. (The best was Amazon.com (AMZN), at 42.5% per year, with Facebook (FB) placing second.) Of the 67 entrants, only four lost money, with the worst being General Electric (GE), which dropped 6.6% per year. A fifth, Schlumberger (SLB), eked out a narrow gain, but trailed inflation. The other 62 stocks that made up August 2013's top 1% list all posted positive real returns—a success rate of more than 90%. When it came to selecting blue chips, darts would have sufficed. Not so for the small fry. Of the 6,442 companies that posted five-year returns (some dropped out due to mergers), nearly half posted negative returns. The median result was a paltry 1.2%—less than the rate of inflation. Naturally, the group's top winners outpaced the blue-chip leaders (including Digital Asset Monetary Network, which turned its $10 million market capitalization into $430 million), but the occasional explosions were overwhelmed by all those duds. FAAMG in Disguise? This may sound like another version of the FAAMG argument. Modified from the original version of FANG, the FAAMG group of stocks—the aforementioned Facebook, Amazon, and Apple, plus Microsoft (MSFT) and Google (GOOG)—is said to have driven the market's recent growth. Remove those firms, runs the contention, and the stock market would be treading water. True enough, if overstated. However, this column is different. FAAMG addresses the behavior of market-capitalization-weighted indexes, for example the S&P 500. Such indexes are heavily influenced by the behavior of their largest, most-volatile members. That is not so with this study, which is equally weighted. If the FAAMG companies did not exist, the biggest firms would still have notched a substantially better median return than the broad market, along with a higher percentage of stocks that enjoyed double-digit gains. Thus, the success of the large companies is broader than has been portrayed. The FAAMG discussion implies that a handful of firms have diverged; but the list is longer than that. Would You Have Found Berkshire Hathaway in 1975? Two Tiers What FAAMG does get correct, however, is the notion of a two-tier marketplace. As we have seen, the top 1% contained no true "have-nots." None of the group's companies went bankrupt, or even suffered the threat of such a fate. Its laggard, General Electric, steadily grew its revenue while remaining profitable. Its stock performance disappointed, to be sure, but with more than $10 billion in operating cash flow over the trailing 12 months, General Electric is far from destitute. However, in relative terms there certainly were two camps: growth and value. To generalize, the costlier stocks among the top 1% became costlier yet, while the cheaper stocks languished. That is, within the top 1% of companies, the stocks that were more popular entering the period maintained their popularity, while the relative outcasts remained that way. Specifically, of the 12 firms that had the highest price/book ratios in August 2013, nine enjoyed double-digit gains. (Once again, this was not a FAAMG effect, as there were but two FAAMG stocks among those 12 companies.) In contrast, only four of the cheapest 12 entrants accomplished the feat. It was a difficult time indeed for large-value managers. While history shows that the mean usually reverts, such that the underappreciated companies regain favor, that has not been the case over this recent stretch. Root Causes The obvious question is, why? One potential answer is economic. Perhaps the business results of the more-expensive companies were pleasant surprises. When the study began, the pricier companies were expected to grow faster than were the cheaper firms. That is why they commanded steeper price/book ratios. However, if their superiority was even greater than expected, then their stocks might have outperformed. The other possibility concerns sentiment. It may be that the business results of the costlier firms have so far met expectations, but that their stock prices have risen because investors have become more optimistic yet about their futures. That is, rather than rewarding the popular companies for what they have done (the economic explanation), investors have instead bid up their stocks based on what they believe will happen. Friday's column will discuss which of the two possibilities seems more likely, and what that answer might mean for the performance of the biggest companies going forward. Looking backward, as this column showed, the answer is clear: Just as with individuals, the top 1% of corporations has never been better. John Rekenenthaler has been researching the fund industry since 1988. He is now a columnist for Morningstar.com and a member of Morningstar's investment research department. John is quick to point out that while Morningstar typically agrees with the views of the Rekenenthaler Report, his views are his own.
